Development Matters About a month ago, an app I've been working on for the last 4 years, Tawk.to, appeared in the App Store. Though I have been an iOS developer for the last 5+ years, I was surprised to see it in the App Store, as I'm not big on the App Store nor have my own PR for it, so I didn't bother with it. Just like every other developer, I didn't even think about the fact that if it gets rejected, it is likely to stay in the App Store for some time and appear to be one of the most downloaded apps of the day.

When I realised I'm being trolled, I left it to go through the process of App Store approval. I was pleasantly surprised that they rejected it.

However, rather than accepting their offer, I decided to fix the issue and wanted to share the lessons I learnt for aspiring iOS developers.

Rejection and Playing the Game One of the essential lessons that I learned was a business lesson: Don't give in to the temptation to do what you can to get it in the App Store. If you get rejected, it's your own fault for not doing your own check before releasing your app to App Store. What you should learn is to not be afraid to get rejected from App Store. As I've mentioned before, sometimes you just have to play the game. If you don't get rejected, you could just be doing something wrong, or the App Store is just testing you. Whatever the case, you just have to play the game and try again. The other lesson was about being a developer. iOS development in particular is similar to software development in general. You don't actually control the process. A surprising and unusual thing is the rejection and subsequent approval of an app, and how it 6d1f23a050
